

The second entrance, secondary today but originally the main one, opens to the side Street Dibujante Manuel Gago.

This doorway stands out because on it we can see an image of Saint Nicholas of Bari, the former patron saint of the church.

The church has no side chapels, as the narrowness of its construction does not permit this. As a backdrop to the existing images, there are stained glass windows illuminated by lights that enhance the images.

The bell tower, hexagonal, with two sections and a top, built in the XVIII century, stands out for its great height and its weathervane in the shape of a cockerel, which is a characteristic symbol of Patraix.

It was remodelled in 1917 by the architect Francisco Javier Goerlich Lleó and to him we partly owe its current configuration, although the top of the belltower, with the ceramic tile dome and weathervane, was built in its reconstruction in the 1940s, after the damage caused by the civil war. It has four bells, San Juan Bautista (1924), San Vicente Ferrer (1940), Virgen de los Desamparados (1940) and Virgen Milagrosa (2018).

In this church, the remains of the first marquis of Cruilles rest, which were moved in 1872 from the no longer existing convent of Our Lady of Salvation of València. Above them is a tombstone, also original from the convent.

Cardinal Benlloch –Juan Bautista Benlloch i Vivó, whose family was from the neighbourhood– visited Patraix in 1924 and gifted the bell that bears his name: Juan Bautista. It is said that in 1936 all bells were thrown away, with the exception of this one, Juan Bautista, because it struck the hours and belonged to the town hall.
